THE DATA

2,972

Construction Establishments (2022)

Bexar County hosts more construction establishments than any other Texas county, a clear indicator of sustained economic and housing activity.

This figure reflects a deep structural foundation in Bexar County's real estate ecosystem. The high concentration of construction firms is not a temporary spike but a long-term trend tied to population growth, infrastructure investment, and urban expansion. It suggests that demand is not just for housing, but for a full range of built environments — from residential to commercial to public infrastructure.

01

Construction is the new infrastructure

This is not a boom driven by speculative finance. It is a bottom-up, operational expansion — the kind that persists through interest rate cycles. The data implies that the market's resilience is not just in prices, but in its underlying institutional capacity to deliver.

02

Bexar County is the engine

This creates a central-periphery dynamic: Bexar County is the source of capital, labor, and materials, while other counties are constrained by access. The result is a real estate ecosystem where growth is not evenly distributed, and where new development in outlying areas is inherently dependent on Bexar's stability — making Bexar not just a market leader, but a systemic anchor.
