Expert Consensus

The CSET analysis reveals deep divergence among experts regarding the outcomes of the Trump-Xi summit on AI policy.

The summit did not yield binding agreements, but it underscored a critical tension: while some experts see it as a strategic breakthrough, others view it as a tactical delay tactic. This schism reflects a broader challenge in AI governance—how to translate high-level diplomatic engagement into enforceable norms.

01

Diplomacy Without Enforcement

The split among experts reveals a fundamental flaw in current AI governance: the reliance on summit-level dialogue without mechanisms for accountability. When consensus is fractured, even high-profile meetings risk becoming performative, allowing adversaries to advance unchecked. This undermines trust in multilateral AI frameworks.

02

The Cost of Perceived Progress

When diplomacy is mistaken for progress—especially in AI safety—stakeholders may lower their guard. The perception of breakthroughs can delay domestic policy reforms, international treaties, and investment in verification systems. In a field where timing determines safety, perceived consensus can be more dangerous than disagreement.
