THE DATA

Voting Sites on Campus

Purdue University is hosting two official voting locations for the upcoming midterm election.

The Convergence Center for Innovation and Collaboration and the Córdova Recreational Sports Center are serving as official early and Election Day voting sites. This dual-use model demonstrates how secure, high-traffic public infrastructure is being re-engineered to meet both civic and technological demands.

01

Security as a Design Layer

The integration of voting infrastructure into research and recreation centers reflects a shift in physical layer design: access control, surveillance, and identity verification are no longer add-ons but embedded features. This mirrors the architecture of AI data centers where perimeter security, biometric access, and real-time monitoring are foundational, not optional.

02

Democratizing Access, Centralizing Trust

By placing voting access within campus hubs already equipped with secure networks and identity verification systems, Purdue is creating a model for trusted digital infrastructure. This parallels the semiconductor industry's push for sovereign, closed-loop fabrication ecosystems—where physical and digital trust are co-located at the source.
